Speakers & Topics

Research methods and techniques from the fields of sociology and other allied disciplines have been popularly employed for architectural research. However, considering the nature of field and focus on the quality of built environment and its perception the methods like survey do not provide sufficient answers to architects and designers. Pioneering works of Kevin Lynch, Henry Sanoff, William Whyte to name a few, inspired researchers in Architecture to experiment, evolve and employ visual research methods in architecture which have been extremely useful. The training program primarily focuses on use of visual research methods used in architectural research. These methods help in understanding the perceptions and preferences of the end users about the visual and spatial environments and hence enable the designers to create user friendly environments. Similarly introduction of these methods in design studios can help the students to take appropriate design decisions. Hence this program is useful to professionals as well as academicians.
